According to the census (2010) it has a population of 47733 inhabitants. It has 10 rural locations that have decreased since the railroad was cancelled. They continue to exist due to the efforts of the population and the municipality that provides health and education services.

The Party has 423,000 inhabitants, 390,000 have engaged in agricultural-livestock production. The main crops are: wheat, corn, sunflower, and soybeans.

The industry that exists is related to the Agro. This means that there is a direct relation between the industry and the district. So, when the industry thrives, the province thrives too. But, when the industry declines, the province is impoverished.

In the centre-west of Buenos Aires province, the district “9 de Julio” extends its fields of culture, its lagoons, channels and wooded walks.

The historical Museum dedicated to gather documents and historical pieces and the rural town La Niña, which struggled in the last decade because of natural transformations that obliged its citizens to alter their life style; both places are important tourism centres, that everyone should meet someday.

These characteristics make the party of 9 de Julio, a tourist destination for those who seek serene rest and a framework of exquisite nature.
